How To Recover From An Extended Break

By Louie Zhu

We've all had that feeling; that feeling of not wanting a break to end, no matter how small or big.

We've already developed habits to maximise our lazing about and minimising our work. But now that it's 'back to uni' time, it's also 'back to the grind of having to get up early' time. For some of us, it can be jarring having to go straight from leisure to work, and there's usually a couple of days (or weeks) of lag time before you adjust. Here are a couple of tips to help with the transition.

Gradually re-introduce work.

Our natural inclination is to keep doing what we've been doing, especially if what we've been doing has been relaxing all day.

Although it's important to start as soon as you can to keep up with uni, taking on everything at once can be overwhelming and stressful. Instead, introduce work slowly every day until you start to feel comfortable again. Maybe begin with a half hour on your first day back and build from there.

Also, keep in mind that the first few days of uni probably won't be that intense, so it's the perfect time to gradually re-introduce study to your life.

Re-establish a routine.

Following on from this, it's important to prepare for uni ahead of time as well. Once you're back into the swing of things, structure your work so that you know how much time is required for each subject.

Keep a regular schedule of what you should be doing, when. You can make this flexible, especially if you have more work for a particular subject in a particular day or week; in general though, stick to your schedule.

Implement good habits on holiday.

There is a temptation on holidays to completely abandon all the good habits you've built up during the uni term, mainly because you're on, well, holidays. Even though you really want to make the most of your holidays, you shouldn't completely abandon your routine. It can make the transition back to uni much harder.

No one's expecting you to do any hardcore work during the break; simply stick to general guidelines like waking up or getting to bed at the same time you would if you had uni. This can help prevent massive grogginess later. Of course, if you must wake up at an ungodly hour because your uni is far away, by all means, wake up at a more reasonable time during holidays (but try not to deviate too much—an hour is pretty easy to correct for, but maybe not two or three).

Sure, go out there and enjoy your holidays. Just think of these steps a few days before the holidays end and your body and mind will end up thanking you over the next ten weeks.

Five Hacks To Help You Save Time In The Morning (Because Sleep Is Love, Sleep Is Life)

By Anne Tong

You've probably all heard this statistic: Everyone should get at least eight hours of sleep a night. Uhh, kind of hard when you have mountains of homework, exams and assignments to study for, right?

Luckily, where there's a will, there's a hack. Here are just a few for all the time-poor folk out there.

Pack your bag before you sleep.

No matter how tired you are, try to get your bag packed before you hit the sack. Throw all your textbooks and stationery in there, along with essentials like your keys and wallet.

I found it helpful to keep my bag, school shoes and socks in a designated corner of the room. That way, if I was ever running late, I knew that everything I needed was where it should be. There's nothing worse than missing your bus or train because you're trying to find your calculator or transport card.

Making organised piles is effective, yet understated. They help you declutter your room and make it less stressful in the mornings. Oh, also make sure you have a designated umbrella place too.

Make your lunch (and breakfast) in advance.

If you're bringing delicious leftovers, shovel it all into a container before you sleep. Bringing snacks or fruit? Pile them up together in the fridge. (Yep, again with the piles.)

Planning breakfast the night before saves time and ensures you get some food in you before you leave. One of my favourite hacks (particularly in summer) is putting pre-cut fruit into zip-lock bags and leaving them in the freezer overnight. In the morning, I'll dump them into a blender with some milk or water and voilà: a fuss-free breakfast smoothie! The best part is you can leave the blender running while you gather the last few bits and pieces, and you won't have to worry about anything burning.

Oh, you can also just leave bread in your toaster the night before so all you have to do the next morning is push down the lever. Yep, laziness can sometimes be inspired.

Brush your teeth in the shower.

This is honestly such a guilty pleasure because you're killing two birds with one stone. Showers are just awesome to begin with, so why not extend that awesomeness and do as much as you can in there?

Sometimes I find myself zoning out in the shower, entering a vortex of random thoughts. Now I can do all of that and brush my teeth at the same time. Magical.

Dry shampoo and deodorant are your absolute best friends.

Sometimes there's no time to shower; other times, you might not be bothered. (Seriously, we're only human.) It can be incredibly time-consuming, and when you couple it with washing and drying your hair, even more so.

A simple solution is getting yourself an emergency kit of dry shampoo and deodorant. These two items are precious gifts to mankind. Do yourself a favour and stock your bathroom with these lifesavers. 🛒

Stressed? Here Are Some Self-Help Strategies For Dealing With Anxiety

By Student Edge & ReachOut.com

No matter your age, experience or current situation, stress and anxiety can strike at any time.

We don't say that to scare you, but to reassure you: if you're feeling overwhelmed at the moment, rest assured you are far from alone.

Stress is our body's way of preparing to meet a tough situation with focus, stamina, and heightened alertness. But if you feel stressed all the time it can end up making you feel overwhelmed.

Anxiety, on the other hand, is an uncomfortable feeling of worry or fear, and is a normal human response to a lot of situations. Everyone feels some anxiety at different times in life, but if it gets in the way of your life, or causes a lot of distress, then it might be time to take action.

We asked our friends at ReachOut.com for advice on how to deal with stress and anxiety. Below you'll find some self-help strategies and personal stories that'll clarify what they are and how you can manage them best.

'I'm always stressed'

"Stressed out all the time? There are a number of reasons you might be struggling to beat stress. Find out what it looks like when stress is causing a problem for your health. If it's really serious and you can't shake the stress, there might be something more serious going on." Read more.

'Stress – a personal story'

Watch as ReachOut.com speaks with a young woman who struggled with the transition from primary school to high school, and again with the transition to university. Read more.

'All about feeling anxious'

"Worried you have anxiety symptoms? Find out what anxiety is, and the key signs that anxiety is affecting someone. If this looks like you get directions on how to do something about it." Read more.

'Self-help strategies for anxiety'

"Self-help strategies can be really powerful tools in coping with anxiety and improving your daily life. Find out more about different techniques you can use to manage anxiety, services you can access, and what to do if you are still finding your symptoms hard to control." Read more.

'A day in the life: Social anxiety disorder'

Five Tips To Help You Transition To University

By Natasha Romas

If you are reading this article it is very likely that 1) you are about to transition into university and 2) you're looking for tips!

Fear not, young Padawans, for I am here to help.

Having started my university journey in 2015 I can safely say all the feelings you are currently experiencing are exactly what everyone else is feeling right now.

I can also tell you that any feelings of doubt or fear will quickly fade as you realise that university is a really awesome place to be.

Get around it!

First mistake you can make going into uni is plunging your head into the books and telling yourself that if you don't get an 'A' on each assignment you will forever fail at life. You can relax (somewhat) and enjoy yourself. It would be a mistake to ignore all the social events, clubs and opportunities that university has to offer. Not only does getting involved allow you to make friends socially, it also allows you to form valuable networks for your working career at the end of your degree.

Seek help if you need it.

Gone are the days where teachers will pester you for homework and ask if 'you understand the question'. You have to push yourself. However! 'Pushing yourself' does not mean there is no one to help you along the way. Your lecturers and tutorial teachers are available to answer questions, so don't be afraid to ask. The other great thing about uni is that most have departments dedicated to helping students with assignments and some will even proof your writing.

Use your rocks!

No, not actual rocks, silly! I mean the people who ground you and people you can rely on for support. It is easy to want to move away from home in pursuit of independence and think you can do it all alone. Everyone deals with change differently and, for some, it can be a little overwhelming at first. Even if you are commuting and still living at home, at uni you no longer have the same familiarity with peers because people at uni are constantly coming and going. If things are getting a little hard—you're stressed out or just not coping—look to the people who can encourage you and put things into perspective. So many times after having a stressful day at uni, I would just ring home to mum to get it off my chest.

Own a diary. Srs.

You think you can go without one? LOL. The single greatest weapon (in a non-literal sense) you can take into university is a diary. Particularly in the first and last few weeks of semester, you will be overwhelmed with important dates, and without the constant nagging of your teachers, mum and dad, and reminders from peers, it is easy for an assignment to creep up on you. If that happens, you may find yourself pulling frantic all-nighters that will certainly drain your energy and hopes for a decent mark. All-nighters work for some, but not many!

First-year is about getting your head in the game and no one expects that you'll immediately know how to play. If your marks aren't great at the start, don't beat yourself up. The standards at uni may or may not be different to what you're used to. Remember why you're at uni and learn from every assignment you do. Persistence in first year is key. 🍀

How To Make New Friends (At Uni Or In Life)

By Karyn Tee

Some people are winners: confident; magnetic; it's like they're playing life on easy.

The rest of us... well, we spend our time reading articles about how to make new friends, or what to do when we accidentally make eye contact with someone on the bus.

Deep down, science says, we all crave meaningful human interaction, and all too often, we find ourselves in search of something more. Something to freshen up our old, stagnant circles. A fairy-tale meeting, perhaps? A chance encounter with our platonic soul mate.

Thoughts like these are one reason we're here writing articles about friendship instead of actually being out with friends.

If you want to connect with people, you can't sit around waiting. My first tip? Be proactive. Be aggressively proactive. If you're new somewhere, you already have an excuse. Interrupt conversations and introduce yourself like you're somebody they should know.

If you don't have somewhere to be new at, find a place. Find an online place, if that's where you're more comfortable.

Of course, it's easier said than done. So, it may come to this: If you want new friends, put yourself in positions where you and the people around you have little choice but to develop a firm rapport.

Sign up for classes that involve teamwork; join a committee; play a sport. Take pictures and promise to send them to your new friend later—voilà, you now have their contact details and an excuse to start a conversation.

Once you have that excuse, you're almost set. The key now is to spin conversation until the two of you are bound tight by the unbreakable thread of best-friendship. It is useful to keep a stash of interests you can draw from to enthuse about if the conversation grows stale, as well as a question bank to proffer so your partner gets a go too. Nothing cements a friendship better than feeling like the other person loves the same things you do.

This is all rather clinical, isn't it? But if you were the sort of person who could easily navigate the ever-changing seas of interpersonal communication, you wouldn't be here. So, don't be ashamed to have a formula to fall back on. The measure of a friendship's success is how it survives the years, not the circumstances under which it was formed.

I will reiterate this: deep down, we all crave meaningful human interaction. There's always room for one more friend, and there will always be people to befriend. Give others reason to care about you—be a classmate; be a fellow hobbyist; be the person who listens when they're in need of an audience—and see if they reciprocate. Often, they will.

We can't all find life easy. But having someone to share our struggles with? Well, that's a victory to cherish. 💡
